'Dissenter' to retire from 6th Circuit Court of Appeals

Judge, 77, served on Michigan Supreme Court from 1975 to 1985

By JOHN MINNIS
Legal News

Imagine, if you will, a major alternative-energy company wants to locate within the City of Detroit, promising 6,000 jobs directly, and thousands more indirectly.

With 28 percent unemployment and huge budget deficits, Mayor Dave Bing and the city council are elated. With metro-area unemployment at 14 percent, Wayne, Oakland and Macomb County leaders back the plan, as do the governor and state lawmakers, who themselves are facing a $1 billion budget deficit.

The company, though, wants the city to provide a 500-acre site with adequate road and rail access. The site the company wants is occupied by 6,000 residents, 1,400 homes, 144 businesses, 16 churches, two schools and a hospital.

Undaunted, the city proceeds under eminent domain to take the property for the economic "public good." A handful of residents, however, don't want to move, and others distrust the company's promises. They sue the city. The case makes it all the way to the Michigan Supreme Court, where two justices, despite the economic distress facing the city and state and despite near universal support of the plan, dissent.

Those courageous justices would be someone like Judge James L. Ryan, soon to retire from the U.S. Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit.

In fact, while on the Michigan Supreme Court, Ryan was one of only two dissenters in Poletown Neighborhood Council v. Detroit. The year was 1981 amid the last "great recession" facing Detroit and Michigan. The company was General Motors, and the property bordered Hamtramck and was known as "Poletown" due to the once concentration of Polish Americans.

In a 5-2 decision, with Justice John W. Fitzgerald joining the dissent, the state high court upheld the city's economic taking of the property and deeding it over to a private company, GM, for the "public good." In its per curiam opinion, the court said the public benefits were "clear and significant" and that the private benefits to General Motors were "merely incidental."

It was a landmark case, and the court seemed to know it was breaking new ground. "If the public benefit was not so clear and significant," the court said, "we would hesitate to sanction approval of such a project."

"There were an awful lot of cases," says Ryan, 77, when asked about his most memorable cases over the years. "The Poletown case gained some national attention, and I wrote the dissenting opinion."

Fitzgerald submitted his dissent along with the majority's per curiam opinion. Ryan took another month to gather his thoughts.

"Unemployment was very high," Ryan recalls of the time three decades ago. "The City of Detroit condemned hundreds of acres for what was called a public benefit to help resolve high unemployment. The only problem is that homeowners thought it was unconstitutional to virtually give the land to General Motors. The Michigan Constitution says 'public use' not 'benefit.'"

Life went on, the plant was built. But 23 years later, Ryan was vindicated when the Michigan Supreme Court "vehemently" reversed itself in County of Wayne v. Hathcock.

The 2004 case involved the so-called "Pinnacle Project," an "aeropark" near Metro Airport. That project, too, promised to create thousands of jobs, but the court fell back on Ryan's "public use" argument under the state Constitution.

Ryan's moral victory was short-lived, however, when the U.S. Supreme Court upheld an economic-development taking similar to Poletown in Kelo v. City of New London (2005).

"They came to the wrong decision," Ryan says of Kelo. "The Supremes were wrong, but they're the Supremes."
