Michigan spends more than $2M so far on Flint water probe

LASINGO (AP) — Records unsealed Monday in the Flint water probe show the city's ex-utility chief knew in 2014 that the city's water was increasingly corrosive and was being mishandled.

Bob Jelks, who led the city's Department of Public Works at the time, was told by one of his subordinates that the city's water was connected to a new water treatment plant that laid pipes next to the Flint River and that new pipes were laid into the Flint River.
